

Subject: Re: Rasmus Bruckner : License if maps are used in research study
From: 2-Minute Tabletop <support@2minutetabletop.freshdesk.com>
Date: 13.08.22, 06:16
To: rasmusb@zedat.fu-berlin.de
CC: 2minutetabletop@gmail.com

Hi Rasmus!

That's fine by me, even if it one day appears in a research article or somesuch. Please consider this email as my express permission, and have fun!

Have a good one,
– Ross

On Mon, 8 Aug at 9:53 PM , Rasmus Bruckner <rasmusb@zedat.fu-berlin.de> wrote:

Hi Ross,

I'm a cognitive neuroscientist and psychologist from Berlin, Germany. I examine human learning and decision making based on experimental studies. I have recently downloaded a couple of maps from your website (Order #1154282). I'd like to use one of them in a task that we use in some of our studies.

I'm wondering if the general licensing and attribution terms apply in my case. Our research is non-commercial, and the tasks are publicly available on GitHub (<https://github.com/rasmusbruckner/AdaptiveLearning>), where I could certainly provide attribution. However, when our work is published, it often involves for-profit publishing companies. For two examples, see <https://elifesciences.org/articles/46975> and <https://www.nature.com/articles/ncomms11609>

In such publications, we usually show examples of our tasks, and if I were allowed to use one of your maps, it is likely that at some point, it would also appear in such a journal. I could definitely also provide attribution in this case, but I'm wondering if this would already count as "commercial" and violate the license. Would you mind letting me know what you think about this case? I'd love to include your maps in the task and look forward to your reply!

Best wishes,
Rasmus

From Rasmus Bruckner at rasmusb@zedat.fu-berlin.de
This message was sent via the 2minutetabletop.com contact form